

Wilson and Robinson Achieve Dismissal of Race Discrimination Lawsuit Against State's Largest Public Employer

FormanWatkins attorneys Malissa Wilson and Mandie Robinson have obtained the court's complete dismissal of all claims against the State's largest public employer, and several of its individual employees, in a suit alleging that the Plaintiff had been discriminated against based on his race. Plaintiff sued FormanWatkins' clients alleging that he was the subject of racially discriminatory actions in his workplace and that his employment was eventually terminated in retaliation for his complaints regarding such alleged discrimination. The FormanWatkins team filed a motion to dismiss all of Plaintiff's claims, arguing the actions of its clients were not related to Plaintiff's race in any way. The U.S. District Court of the Northern District of Mississippi agreed, dismissing all of Plaintiff's claims against both the employer and the individual employees that had been named as defendants in Plaintiff's lawsuit.
